

Representing yourself in a restraining order final hearing – respondent

This information is for respondents who have received a summons to go to court for a restraining order final hearing and are representing themselves.

The following terms are used:

- Applicant – the person who wants the order for themselves or to protect someone else.
- Respondent – the person against whom the order is sought or made.
- Person bound – if a restraining order is made this is the person who has to follow the order.
- Person protected – the person who has the benefit of the order if an order is made.

This infosheet should be used after seeing a lawyer for advice.

Nuts and bolts for appearing at court

- Try to get to the court early to be prepared.
- Be on time if you cannot be early.
- Dress neatly and appropriately. You will not be allowed into court in a singlet or without shoes.
- Bring all of your paperwork with you organised in a way you can easily find what you want.
- Make sure you have parking for the day or have transport home as you may have to wait a while before your case is heard.
- Make child care arrangements before going to court. Contact the court well before to see if the court can help with child care. At some courts a month's notice is required.
- Organise someone to pick up any children from school or daycare as you may be at court all day.
- If you know you need an interpreter contact the court as soon as possible before the court date to ask them to arrange one.
- When you get to the court check the lists on the walls or ask staff at the court registry to tell you which courtroom you are in.
- As soon as you get to the courtroom you should tell the orderly in the court that you are there.
- The orderly will call the name of the applicant and your name when your case is ready to start.
- Do not have your mobile phone, pager or other electronic device on in court.
- Do not chew gum or eat in court.
- Bow to the magistrate when you enter and leave the courtroom.
- Call the magistrate "Your Honour".
- If the applicant has a lawyer, they may want to talk to you. You do not have to talk to them if you do not want to. Do not be pressured into agreeing to the order or agreeing to conditions in the order but be realistic about what a magistrate may do after hearing the evidence.
- If you agree to:

- an undertaking (see the Legal Aid WA infosheet – Undertakings in restraining order proceedings), or
- for family violence restraining orders (FVRO), a “conduct agreement order” (CAO) (see the Legal Aid WA infosheet – Conduct agreement orders), or
- consent orders in VRO and MRO cases,

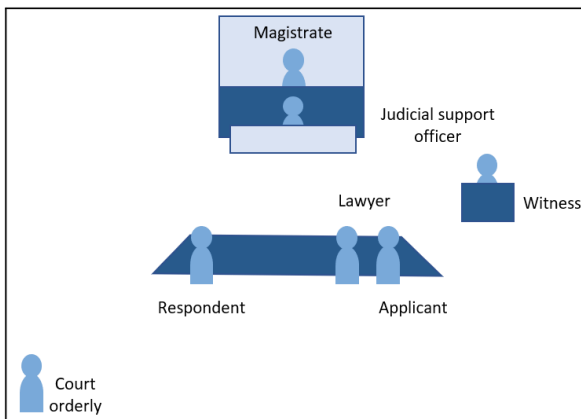

you can speak to the lawyer about whether the applicant will accept an undertaking, a CAO (in an FVRO case) or consent orders in VRO or MRO cases. Otherwise raise this with the magistrate when your case is called into court.

- Try not to talk or whisper to others while you are waiting in the courtroom.

What happens at the final order hearing?

A picture of the courtroom is shown below.

Final order hearing, when applicant is legally represented and the respondent is not legally represented

- You are called the respondent or the “person to be bound”.
- You sit on the left hand side of the table.
- The person who has applied for the restraining order against you will sit on the right hand side of the table.
- The hearing will be before a magistrate.
- Any witnesses should wait out of court until it is their turn to give evidence.
- Any documents you have summonsed go straight to the court. You should apply to the court before the hearing date to inspect them.

You need to fill in a “Form 1 Request to inspect or obtain a copy of a court record”. If you have not inspected the documents before the hearing date you will need to ask for your case to be mentioned in front of the magistrate as early as possible so that you can ask to see the documents before the hearing starts.

Order of evidence and questioning

What a person says in the witness box is “evidence”. The magistrate listens and thinks about everyone’s evidence to decide if a restraining order should be made. Evidence does not include anything said outside the witness box, such as what you say when you talk to the magistrate in court at the table in front of them.

You should take notes of what the applicant and each witness says when they give evidence.

On one page write down things you agree with. On another page write down what you don’t agree with.

The applicant’s evidence

The applicant will be asked to tell their story first.

The applicant has to swear an oath or make an affirmation that they will tell the truth. They then tell the court:

- Their name and occupation.
- That their restraining order is sought against you and their relationship or connection to you.
- The date they applied for and got the interim family violence restraining order (FVRO) or interim violence restraining order (VRO) (if applicable).

Your behaviour

They will tell the court:

- Full details of your behaviour (including pattern of behaviour in FVRO cases) and the effect it has had on them.
- Your criminal and police history (if relevant).
- Your behaviour towards others (if similar).

They are likely to refer to any of your acts of family violence and personal violence.

Action they have taken as a result of your behaviour

They may give details of action they have taken because of your behaviour, for example:

- Gone to counselling.
- Reported things to the police.
- Received medical help.

Breaches of an interim FVRO/VRO

They will tell the court:

- Any times where you have breached the FVRO/VRO.
- Any information about what happened after you breached it, for example, police investigations.

Why they need the order

They will tell the court:

- Why they want and need the restraining order.
- What they are afraid of happening if they do not get the order.

Children

They will tell the court:

- Whether there are any Children's Court or Family Court orders or any other orders or legal proceedings between yourself and the protected person.
- If they want the restraining order to cover other people, for example your children, they will need to give evidence about what has happened to them.

Your questions of the applicant

When the applicant has finished giving their evidence you will be given a chance to put your questions to them.

How your questions are put to the person protected

If you don't have a lawyer and you are in a family relationship, the magistrate will usually order that you cannot ask direct questions to the person protected. You will be allowed to ask your questions to the person protected by stating the questions to the magistrate, who will then ask the person protected the questions if they are appropriate. The same may apply for witnesses.

In cases where there is not a family relationship and you don't have a lawyer, if the applicant feels intimidated by you, they can tell the magistrate. The magistrate may make you ask the questions to them instead of directly to the person protected.

Your questions of the applicant and their witnesses (cross-examination)

- You should ask the applicant and their witnesses questions about anything they say that you disagree with. This is so they can have a chance to comment on your version of what happened. For example, that you did not make calls to the applicant as they say you did.
- If the applicant denies something you have proof of, you should show them the proof and ask your questions to see what they say. For example, you could show them your phone records if they say you called from your phone but you say you didn't.
- If you don't ask questions about each thing you disagree with, the court will think you agree with what the the applicant or witness has said.
- If you don't ask the applicant about a particular fact you disagree with, you will not usually be able to talk to the magistrate about it later when you give your evidence.
- You should only ask the applicant questions that are about the restraining order application and the evidence they have given.
- Do not make statements.
- If the applicant thinks your question is not about the restraining order application, they can tell the magistrate and the magistrate will decide if they need to answer the question.

The magistrate may also ask some questions.

If you don't ask questions about each thing you disagree with, the court will think you agree with what the applicant or witness has said.

More evidence from the applicant (re-examination)

Once you have finished asking your questions the applicant can ask to give some more evidence. This must only be about particular issues they need to clarify. This is called "re-examination". You cannot question the applicant again after this.

The applicant's other witnesses

When the applicant has finished re-examination they leave the witness box and go back to their place at the table.

The applicant, or their lawyer if they have one, will tell the court if they have any witnesses and the name of the first witness.

The orderly will bring the witness into the courtroom, to the witness box, and they will be sworn in or make an affirmation.

The applicant can ask witnesses questions about what they have seen or heard. They cannot put words in their mouth or suggest an answer.

The applicant or their lawyer will ask the witness their name, address and occupation.

Then they are likely to ask questions such as:

- How do they know the applicant?
- Whether they know you and, if so, how?

If the witness is there to give evidence about particular events they may be asked:

- Whether they remember particular dates or events?
- What happened on that day?
- What they saw and heard?
- What happened?
- What your behaviour towards the applicant has been like?

They will probably follow this same process for every different event.

You are allowed to ask the applicant's witnesses questions (cross-examination)

- Once the applicant has finished asking their questions you are allowed to ask the witness questions.
- If the witness is a child you will have to give your question to the magistrate or a person approved by the court who will ask the child the question.
- You can only ask the witness questions about whether or not the applicant needs a restraining order and the evidence they have given.
- If the questions are not about this or are offensive, the applicant or their lawyer can stand up and say "objection". Then they can say the question is offensive or irrelevant and the magistrate will decide whether or not you are allowed to ask that question.

Re-examination

The applicant, or their lawyer if they have one, can re-examine the applicant's witnesses if they need to.

This procedure is followed for all the of the applicant's witnesses. When the applicant is finished with their witnesses they then tell the court that their evidence is completed.

Children as witnesses

- Children are not normally allowed to give evidence in restraining order hearings in the Magistrates Court. There are special rules about calling a child as a witness. See the infosheet - Preparing for a restraining order final hearing - respondent.
- If they are not allowed to, or the applicant doesn't want to get a child to come to court, the applicant can tell the court about what the child has seen or heard when they were present. The applicant can also say what the child has said or done in response to what they have seen or heard.
- If you are not represented by a lawyer and want to cross-examine a child, you will have to tell the magistrate your questions. The magistrate will decide if the child should have to answer any questions and will ask them.

Your evidence

It will be your turn to give evidence when all the applicant's witnesses have finished their evidence.

- You are not meant to give evidence about things you did not ask the applicant or their witnesses about during the cross-examination. If the applicant, or their lawyer if they have one, interrupts and says this, the magistrate will decide if you are allowed to give that evidence.
- Once you have given evidence, the applicant, or their lawyer if they have one, can ask you questions.
- The applicant will ask questions trying to get you to admit what the applicant said in their evidence unless you have already admitted to it.
- They are also likely to ask questions about things you said that they disagree with.

Your witnesses

- You are also allowed to call witnesses.
- You should ask them about anything they have seen that might help your case.
- The applicant can question your witnesses.
- The applicant is likely to question them about anything they have said that they disagree with.

Summary to the court

When all the evidence has been given the applicant will be given a chance to summarise why the restraining order should be made. You will be given a chance to summarise why the order should not be granted.

- The applicant will go first.
- When it is your turn you should briefly summarise the evidence you and your witnesses have given that shows why an order does not need to be made.
 - If the applicant or their witnesses have admitted anything that helps your case you should say this in the summary.

- The responsibility is on the applicant to prove their case on the balance of probabilities. This means they have to prove, by the evidence they have given the court, that there is a real possibility that:
 - in an FVRO application
 - you have committed family violence against the applicant and are likely to again, or
 - the applicant has reasonable grounds to fear that you will commit family violence against them unless you are restrained.
 - You should tell the court if there are special circumstances that would make the FVRO inappropriate.
 - in a VRO application
 - you have committed personal violence against the applicant and are likely to again, or
 - the applicant has reasonable grounds to fear you will commit personal violence against them unless you are restrained.
 - in a misconduct restraining order (MRO) application, unless you are restrained, you will:
 - act in way that could reasonably make the person seeking to be protected feel intimidated or offended
 - cause damage to the property owned by or in the possession of the person seeking to be protected
 - behave in a way that will lead to a breach of the peace, or
 - commit an offence under section 70A(2A) of the Criminal Code (this means commit an aggravated trespass on an animal source food production place).

Also with both VRO and MRO applications, the court must think it is appropriate in the circumstances to make the order.

What does the court look at before making an order?

FVROs

Before making an FVRO the court has to think about:

- protecting the person seeking to be protected from family violence
- the need to prevent behaviour that could reasonably be expected to cause the person seeking to be protected to fear that they will have family violence committed against them
- the need to ensure the wellbeing of children by protecting them from family violence, reasonable fear of family violence, or being exposed to family violence
- the accommodation needs of you and the person seeking to be protected
- your past history and that of the person seeking to be protected in relation to restraining orders applications
- hardship that may be caused to you if the order is made
- any family orders
- other current legal proceedings involving you and the person seeking to be protected
- your criminal convictions (if any)
- any police orders made against you
- any previous similar behaviour by you towards the person seeking to be protected or other people
- any police incident reports about you
- any risk assessment, or risk-relevant information relating to the relationship between you and the person seeking to be protected
- any other matters the courts considers relevant.

VROs

Before making a VRO, the court has to think about a number of factors. These include:

- protecting the person seeking to be protected from personal violence

- the need to prevent behaviour that could reasonably be expected to cause the person seeking to be protected to fear that they will have personal violence committed against them
- the need to ensure the wellbeing of children by protecting them from personal violence, reasonable fear of it, or being exposed to personal violence
- hardship that may be caused to you if the order is made
- the past history of the person seeking to be protected and you in relation to applications for restraining orders
- any other court matter in which the applicant or you are involved
- your criminal convictions (if any)
- whether you have ever acted in a similar way in the past to any person
- anything else the court thinks is relevant.

MROs

Before making an MRO, the court has to consider a range of factors. These are different depending on which ground the application is based on. These factors may include:

- protecting the applicant from your intimidating and offensive behaviour
- protecting the applicant's property
- the need to ensure that the public is protected from breaches of the peace (if the police seek one for the benefit of the public)
- the need to ensure that the following persons are protected from the effects of an offence under the Criminal Code s 70A(2A):
 - a person engaged in animal source food production as defined in section 70A(1) of the Criminal Code
 - a family member (as defined in section 70A(1) of the Criminal Code) of a person referred to in the previous paragraph
- the wellbeing of children who are likely to be affected by your behaviour or the operation of the proposed order

- where you will live, and in some cases where the applicant will live
- hardship that may be caused to you if the order is made
- your criminal record (if any)
- whether you have ever acted in a similar way in the past to any person
- any other legal proceedings you or in some cases the person seeking to be protected are involved in, and
- anything else the court thinks is relevant.

You will need to check section 35 of the Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) to see which factors the court has to take into consideration in your case.

Restraining orders against a child or young person

If the restraining order sought is against a child or young person aged between 10 and under 18, the Children’s Court magistrate has to be satisfied that appropriate arrangements have been made for the care and wellbeing of the child before it can make a restraining order.

The decision

The court will then make its decision. It can:

- Make the FVRO/VRO/MRO.
 - The court can put any conditions/prohibitions/restrictions on the order that it thinks are necessary.
 - Listen carefully to the conditions. You can ask the magistrate to make changes, for example, to allow you to collect your property on one occasion usually in the company of the police, or to allow you to see or communicate with your children if there are family court orders in place.

or

- Refuse to make an order.

What about legal costs? Will I have to pay?

If the court gives the applicant a final FVRO/VRO/MRO, they can ask for an order for costs against you. This will cover the summons costs (receipts should be shown) or any legal costs they may have paid while preparing for the hearing. For example, the cost of their lawyer if they have one, photocopying costs, witness costs, and costs of getting medical or police reports, etc.

If the court decides that the applicant should not have a restraining order, you may make an application to the court for costs against the applicant. Section 69 of the Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) says that the court is not to make a costs order against the applicant unless their application was “frivolous or vexatious” (that is, their application was completely hopeless and without merit or was not made for genuine reasons).
